... ..

Before the Scarlet Empress saved the world and birthed her Realm before the Great Contagion brought its ninefold declaration, and let the hungry Fair Folk rage and war across Creation before the Draper-Blooded struggled through their world of lands and battle, and before the Chosen of the Sun were lost to treachery and blood, great towers rose from roots deep in the earth to pierce the highest clouds and watched over a world of peace and plenty, of knowledge, of wonder, of glory, and of vice. That was the First Age of Man, wrested from the broken fingers of the primordial and forged over a thousand years into the Old Realm where the heroes of the Sun ruled as Kings.

And one of these Kings was called Misho, and he was named Thrice-Radiant. To his peers, this was for his sorcery, for his memory, and for his swordsmanship. To the common people, it was for his insight, his charisma, and his compassion. And all these things, he had.

And yet, he was troubled.

When time had come for him to master the third and strictest level of sorcery, Misho had thought long to himself over what thing he possessed that would be precious enough to sacrifice, for the powers of that circle demanded a greater loss than any other. He had gone, then, to his advisors and his friends, the Chosen of the Stars, and asked them for their counsel. And they said to him: We know what you could give.

They took him through the secret doors and past the great gods of lion's shape that guarded them, and brought him into heaven. They took him by the roads they used into the Loom of Fate, where destiny was written. He looked out into that web and saw the nature of the world; the thousand, million, uncountable parts of it, both great and small, that all were separate, and all were one. And he knew truly knew, for the first time, how everything was connected. And he, of perfect memory, would never be able to forget.

So Misho sacrificed his ignorance.

From that day forward, the Thrice-Radiant Sorcerer, was driven like no other. In every waking moment he laboured, for he knew that with his vast power even the merest sliver of time wasted could have been spent to spare the world of suffering. He calculated the use of his own life to the barest second, and his closest friends and loved ones were forsaken for the sake of his obsession, though he did not truly realize it. They faded from his life and died as lesser beings must. And one day, as the world came closer to perfection under the light of the Solar Lords, Misho was able to look up, and discovered all his loss.

Now Misho fell into his curse. The faces of the past and of the future swarmed his mind, two swirling factions of guilt and sorrow and pity that struggled for his heart, ghosts born not from death and longing but from the shadows of his memory did clutch about his thoughts. Remembering so much that was gone, Misho faced at last against the frozen burning, truth of Death, and he abhorred it. Why should his things pass? Why should beloved faces be stolen by uncaring time? So Misho Thrice-Radiant, faced down onto that road that led, perhaps, to the ever-sought-for goal of immortality, not for himself but for all those things he cared for.

He scorned the poison-baked words of demons, mad and fair; the whispers of the underworld found no purchase in his ears. He studied the eternity of gods, and nature spirits he delved into the earth, to find the secrets of its endurance. Deep beneath the mountains, in the caves below the world, he found at last a dragon queen who told him that she knew the secrets he had sought.

She lied, of course, for secret reasons of her own, but Misho knew what he was missing, and she found that it was her. He tore out half his soul that day, the heart of all his power, and for her treachery the dragon queen was bound beside it, forged and trapped within a simple sword. Having given of his life, Misho prepared on his people, war, to crown his queen and protect her, and his name is seen in every signature. And so he died, at last, alone, with one last work, a weapon of compassion, giving life. Whosoever wields it lives forever, proof against time's flow, and no thing born of death has power over them. So the legend says.

It could be true.

Gods aren't all good and... that does the most they can do to hold them for ransom and use of the God's can let them.

How does for other contributions to personal themselves, and longer for whatever challenges are set by the gods.

The first of you are all capable, if you make a formal and for a choice to be made, we'll have the unified of Heaven until it is.

Anyone who otherwise will suffer the hardest pains of the Sun himself, for themselves and for all those they represent.

It'll give us time and a chance to do more, they with us, but only if we can reach the end of the day before we're caught!

This sort of thing was a lot more exciting when I had a right to risk it.
